Devices can store tons of data about what you do, and what you see. Many of us know about data tracking and data security, but what if you were to track your own activity? Just as a single person can track a trend from one social media account, what if you could combine all your account logins into a single cohesive unit? This is exactly what Palabre is doing, providing a unique service to help you track your own activity. In short, Palabre goes beyond just providing you with a single username, website and email. It allows you to log in to each of your social media accounts and it allows you to manage what you do on each individually. This platform has two components: Palabre (your personalized account) and the Palabre Network (a system that captures activity from all your accounts). Palabre provides this functionality through a mobile application as well as a web-based interface. Both the mobile application and the web interface let you collect your social media activity, store it and provide you with a clean, easy to use interface. You can store what you see and what you do on social media accounts, and then interact with them in a single list from any device. Palabre also has a feature called the Client which simplifies the login process for your accounts. The Client allows you to copy the URL of the social media login page to your clipboard and then you enter a username and password, a method that is convenient for users of all platforms who want to use Palabre on the go. Configuring Palabre Step 1. Login and select a social media account Step 2. Add new accounts to your list Palabre will enable you to add to your list from the web (and also the mobile apps) by pulling up a suggested list of accounts and allowing you to tick the ones you would like to add to your list. After a successful login, your list of accounts will be temporarily saved, which means that it is saved to your temporary web browser, but not your permanent storage. So you can log in to any account on your laptop, even
