Minimally invasive surgical (MIS) approaches to spine surgery have been increasingly adopted in the surgical treatment of spinal disorders. MIS aims to reduce soft tissue damage and subsequent surgical complications, thereby optimizing patient comfort. MIS can involve the use of local anesthesia with sedation or general anesthesia with or without muscle relaxation. Typical MIS surgery accesses a target area of soft tissue through a small incision, called a skin incision. However, conventional MIS spine surgery may require longer operative times, as well as potential for additional surgical complications compared to traditional open spine surgery. One post-operative surgical complication of increasing concern is spinal epidural hematoma (“EDH”). EDH is a type of epidural hemorrhage that occurs after spinal surgery when cerebrospinal fluid escapes through a surgical dural opening, thereby forming a small amount of blood in the epidural space. As a result, the spinal cord may be compressed causing intense pain, paralysis, and in the worst case, death. Accordingly, there remains a need for systems, methods, and devices for performing minimally invasive spine surgery that mitigate or avoid or reduce the occurrence of at least one of the aforementioned issues associated with current minimally invasive approaches to spine surgery. As Judge Allen pointed out in his dissent in the Furlong case, supra, p. 167, 265 P.2d 485, the statute requires the assertion of an interest in land "by virtue of title to the land, or in any other manner as prescribed" by the statute, before a defendant can become a "tenant" as that term is used in the statute. While in that case the defendant had executed a lease without any reservation of a life estate, the court found that execution of the lease was sufficient to bring the defendant under the provisions of the statute. The court also held that the defendant thereby obtained an interest in the land under a conveyance from a step-uncle and he therefore was a "tenant" as that term was used in the statute. In the case before us, the appellant wife asserts no interest in the land which was conveyed to her in the original warranty deed. It must be conceded, however, that she does have a right f30f4ceada
