Characterization of 3',5'-cyclic adenosine monophosphate-dependent and -independent initiation of poly(A)-containing RNA synthesis. Initiation of transcription of bone marrow poly(A)-containing RNA was studied using the de novo-synthesized [32P]phosphate prelabeled RNA. Addition of [32P]UTP to [32P]UTP-prelabeled fetal calf serum was followed by an increase in the amount of [32P]RNA synthesized. Both the nuclear and the cytoplasmic [32P]RNA synthesis were dependent on cellular de novo protein synthesis and were shown to be 3',5'-cyclic AMP-independent. The results indicate that the increase in cytoplasmic [32P]RNA production is due to the same sequence of events observed in the synthesis of nuclear [32P]RNA. The cytoplasmic [32P]RNA was synthesized under conditions where the 3',5'-cyclic AMP-dependent RNA polymerase activity was inhibited by heparin, 7.5 mM and the cytoplasmic [32P]RNA was not synthesized in the presence of cycloheximide, 10 micrograms/ml. The data suggest that the cytoplasmic [32P]RNA synthesis may be dependent on a 3',5'-cyclic AMP-independent RNA polymerase.Studies of arsenic metabolism have been hampered by lack of an adequate animal model.
